

2005-22

To Whom it Concerns,

I personally know somebody who has undergone and is currently still undergoing a very nasty battle. His ex-girlfriend and he share custody of a 6 year old son. I have been watching this nightmare unfold for the past 2 years. It involves a very mentally sick mother who is consumed with hatred and a desire to get revenge because of his refusal to marry her.

This woman has filed at least 13 false reports with DHS. They have all been found to be unsubstantiated, and yet she continues to create more. She manipulates and emotionally abuses their 6 year old son, and has been doing so since they broke up in 2003. In court last year, the DHS worker who testified on the results of her investigation of that year's accusation of sexual abuse, testified that she believed that the mother had coached the child. Now, the case is to be brought before the court yet again, because the mother has coerced the child to make more accusations of sexual abuse. The police have conducted their investigation and cleared the father, but still, the family court will hear the case again. If the child is given credibility by his mother's statements, she will succeed in destroying the father, the son and their relationship, when in fact the father is guilty of nothing more than rejecting the mother (for good reason, I might add).

This cannot be supported. There are undoubtedly numerous other cases like this every year, in which a father is wrongfully accused. It's the easiest and most expedient way that a hateful mother can remove the father from the picture. Please, don't encourage the behavior by making it even easier to accomplish this crime.

Sincerely,

Naomi M Green
